

Bathroom Sink Installations

The sink installation type you choose is the first step towards achieving your overall style and design goals. Consider whether you want your sink to stand out from, or blend into, the larger bathroom design. Also consider how the sink will impact use: Will you have enough room for all grooming tasks, and how easy will it be to clean the sink?

Pedestal Sinks

A pedestal sink has similar elements to a wall-mounted sink, but it creates more security and doesn't necessarily have to be attached to the wall. Also, the pipes are hidden and protected within the pedestal stand. They don't save any more room in the bathroom or anything like that, but do give it more style and work for bathrooms where the wall is not stable enough to adhere to a wall-mounted sink.

Pedestal sinks can come in various finishes, but more often than not, it will be a white ceramic sink with a white ceramic stand. These can be very easy to install as it really doesn't require any expertise to connect the pipings to the wall and place your pedestal where you want it. One thing to keep in mind is for extra security, it is a good idea to adhere the sink to the wall with some caulk or other sealant, and you can also adhere the pedestal to the floor if you like. But it's not required, but you must be careful not to lean on the sink or place it somewhere unstable as it could risk falling over.

Vessel Sinks

These popular choices for powder rooms rest on top of the counter. The sink's shallow basin accentuates the movement of water.

Undermount Sinks

Undermount sinks are installed underneath your countertop, with a small edge that hangs over the sink. They are an incredible space saver for counter space and super easy to install. An under-mount sink also makes cleaning a dream with no hard-to-reach crevasses, and the fixture is separate from the ceramic sink. The best part about an under-mount sink is that the sink and all of its components can hide within the cabinets, leaving you with a nice, sleek look.

Drop-In Sinks

A drop-in sink is pretty much the opposite of an undermount sink in that rather than the sink installed underneath the countertop with no edge, the sink is dropped into the countertop from above. This allows the sink to have a raised edge and more visibility on top of the counter. These are quite common, especially for bathrooms with a large countertop area and those with his and hers sinks.

Drop-in sinks are incredibly easy to install because a new one can easily be placed in an existing countertop without altering anything. They come in various styles and can work with any possible look you're trying to achieve. They come in pretty standard sizes, and again, the faucet system can be easily switched out for new ones whenever you are updating your existing bathroom and want a change.
